

2K Games officially announced that the sequel to 3D Realms' classic game Duke Nukem 3D will hit retail shelves on May 3, 2011 here in the States, and then on May 6, 2011 internationally for the Xbox 360, PlayStation 3 and Windows PC.

The press release says "Put on your shades and prepare to step into the boots of Duke Nukem, whose legend has reached epic proportions in the years since his last adventure...The alien hordes are invading and only Duke can save the world. Pig cops, alien shrink rays and enormous alien bosses can't stop our hero from accomplishing his one and only goal: to save the world, save the babes and to be a bad-ass while doing it. The King arrives with an arsenal of over-the-top weapons, non-stop action, and unprecedented levels of interactivity. This game puts the pedal to the metal and tongue firmly in cheek. Shoot hoops, lift weights, read adult magazines, draw crude messages on whiteboards or ogle the many hot women that occupy Duke's life - that is if you can pull yourself away long enough from destroying alien invaders." "Duke Nukem was and will forever be a gaming icon, and this is his legend."

Randy Pitchford, president of Gearbox Software said "When I said goodbye to 3D Realms and the original Duke Nukem 3D team in 1997 and soon after founded Gearbox Software, I never in my wildest dreams imagined that a day like today would come,". "Today I am proud, humbled and even astounded to announce that the day is coming at last for all gamers to be a part of video game history: Duke Nukem Forever will launch worldwide this May!" Will be this: once it arrives, will the game live up to all the hype, or was the decade-plus wait just too long for the game to possibly succeed? See Video below to get a sneak pee!! (Get it....sneak peeee)

